Trade Agreements

Tamara Kay, “Legal Transnationalism: The Relationship Between Transnational Social Movement Building and International Law”, Law and Social Inquiry, v. 36 (Spring, 2011) p. 419

Abstract:

The author traces the history of the North American Agreement on Labor Cooperation (NAALC), which is the labor-side component of the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA). NAALC was designed to increase labor standards across the continent, and to establish legal mechanisms for addressing labor complaints. Union leaders have criticized NAALC because it has not raised labor standards, and some argue that post-NAFTA labor conditions in Mexico have gotten worse. The author argues that despite NAALC's ineffectiveness as law, it has had unintended beneficial consequences. Specifically, NAALC has helped workers in the US, Canada, and Mexico form a collective identity, which has encouraged cooperation and cross-border enforcement of labor rights. The author argues that this cooperation may build into a transnational workers movement that could have the effect NAALC promised.

Forced Labor

Jennifer S. Nam, "The Case of the Missing Case: Examining the Civil Right of Action for Human Trafficking Victims", Columbia Law Review, v. 107 (November, 2007) p. 1655

Abstract:

The Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA) was amended in 2003 to create a private right of action under which trafficking victims may sue their traffickers for damages. The author surveys every case brought under this right of action. She finds that in the years since the law's enactment, only 18 suits for damages have been brought against human traffickers. She hypothesizes that the reason for this paucity of cases may be that trafficking victims are afraid of their traffickers, who often have ties to the victim's home country and may threaten the victim's family. In addition, the author notes that because T-Visas are difficult to obtain, particularly for victims whose cases do not result in criminal prosecution of traffickers, the victims may be unable to remain in the United States long enough to file suit or see a civil action through. In addition, the TVPA requires that plaintiffs prove they were subject to a 'severe form of trafficking' in order to have standing. This may prove too high a bar, and too nebulous a standard, for most trafficking victims.

Labor Rights as Human Rights

Note, "Remedying the Injustices of Human Trafficking Through Tort Law", Harvard Law Review, v. 119 (June, 2006) p. 2574

Abstract:

The author of this unsigned note outlines victims' possible remedies for human trafficking. The author notes that 13th Amendment jurisprudence has narrowed the definition of slavery; victims must have suffered physical or legal force to state a 13th Amendment claim. This excludes most victims of contemporary human trafficking, who are often kept in bondage through psychological coercion. The author similarly criticizes the Trafficking Victims' Protection Act, which provides redress for victims of 'severe' forms of trafficking only, which similarly excludes many victims who were intimidated into remaining in bondage. The author proposes that victims seek redress through state tort law, and outlines how a trafficking victim might state a claim for false imprisonment, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and fraud.
